NITRE, nīt'rē, s. [nitre, Fr. nitrum, Latin.] Nitre or salt-petre is a crystalline, pellucid, whitish substance, of an acrid and bitterish taste, impressing a peculiar sense of coldness upon the tongue. This salt affords, by fire, an acrid spirit, capable of dissolving almost every thing, yet manifests no sign of it in its crude state. Nitre is naturally blended in particles in earths, as the particles of metals in their ores. The earth from which nitre is made, in Persia, is a kind of yellowish marl found in the bare cliffs exposed to the northern and eastern winds. From this marl the salt is separated by water. Earths of whatever kind, incostened by the dung and excrement of animals, frequently afford nitre, on being thrown into water and boiled. In France, they make it from old mortar and plaster. A manufactory of nitre might be established in England. The nitrum or nitre of the ancients is salt, extremely different from our nitre, and from all other native salts; being a fixed alkali.
